Some London Impressions.

London and Paris do not seem to realize the luxury of cool things to eat and drink. In London hotels the guest gets a pastry dessert a dozen times where he gets an ice once. In the cafes the waiter stares at the patron who calls for ice, and the thirsty American must raise a mighty kick if he gets a cool drink. When one calls for a lemonade he is served with warm pop, but if he calls for "lemon squash" he gets a third-rate lemonade. But the jolly barmaid helps to tone down his wrath. In the hotels, cafes and office buildings one notices the absence of electric or water fans. A London paper this week mentioned this fact and commented on how slow the English were to adopt such conveniences. The shops and big stores still cling to the cash-boy instead of using the overhead money carrier system. Some day a hustling American will establish a big, modern department store in London and show the English how we do things—and people—in America.

Threadneedle and Lombard are the money streets of London, the former being the home of the most famous bank in the world—the Bank of England. This bank is not forty feet in height, but is very long. It is built of stone, and is imposing in appearance in spite of its lack of height. The bank is open from nine till four, when visitors are permitted to walk through it. There are other noted banks on Threadneedle street, but they are found by the score on Lombard.

The coronation chair was an object of great interest in Westminster Abbey. It is kept in the Confessor's Chapel, where the ashes of kings and queens have been kept for centuries. The coronation chair was made nearly eight hundred years ago by the order of Edward I, and has been used at every coronation since that time. It was last used at the coronation of Queen Victoria on June 28, 1838. The chair resembles the old-fashioned straight-back arm chair, and the seat is of rough stone. A legend says that this stone is the one on which Jacob laid his head, and was brought from the Holy Land to Spain, thence to Ireland and England. Geology is decisive as to the stone's Scottish origin. Be that as it may, all the Sovereigns of England from the time of Edward I have sat on that stone during the coronation ceremony. The chair is black with age, though it looks to be good for another century.

The shops in London lay great store by the patronage of royalty. At half a hundred places can be seen the sign of a chemist, jeweler, perfumer, haberdasher, furrier, etc., with the wording "By Appointment." Wherever the Prince of Wales buys a necktie, shirt or pair of shoes, the dealer immediately works the sale as an advertising scheme for all it's worth. One purchase I made was wrapped in a circular which told that a dozen or more princes and princesses of various countries were his patrons. I bought a necktie in a small shop on Regent street, which is patronized by the Prince of Wales, and the shop-keeper showed me nearly everything he had in the store. The goods were all of fine quality, but they were not made up in as good style as American goods of the same price. These announcements "To Her Majesty," "To The Prince of Wales," "By Appointment," etc., are rather interesting until they get so numerous.

Persons who sail from New York, the home of tall buildings, look in vain for sky-scrapers in London. Most of the buildings are from four to six stories, though an eight or ten story building is occasionally seen. Some of the buildings are very handsome and imposing, though most of them are dark and dingy from age and smoke. Londoners are sensitive regarding the city's reputation for fog, and will tell you that they only have fog at certain short seasons of the year.

Another building made famous by Dickens in several of his novels is the old Bailey prison, or "Old Bailey" as it is familiarly called. The prison stands in a narrow street, and has been the horror of debtors and law-breakers for scores of years. On another street is pointed out a church where David Copperfield met Peggotty on the steps and conversed with her. In almost every part of London one finds obscure places made famous by Dickens, which are always pointed out by the guides.

"WINE, WOMAN AND SONG."

A very attractive show, with a very attractive title, is M. M. Theis's "Wine, Woman and Song," which will be the bill at the Grand Opera House next Friday night. This company needs no special recommendation to local theatre goers, as every one will remember it with pleasure from last season, when it was one of the decided hits that played the Grand. From all accounts the company is even better this season than last. Mr. Theis has engaged for the principal comedy work Sheehan and Kennedy, and Gilbert and Goldie two of the cleverest teams in the business; they in addition to The Jenny Eddy Trio; The Three Rackets, Kine and Gotthold, furnish the specialty acts in the olio. The chorus is a special feature of the "Wine, Woman and Song" company; the girls are not only attractive, but possess remarkably good voices, and are costumed in a most fetching manner. There are two burlettas, one at the commencement of the program, and one at the end, both are brimfull of good comedy, and interspersed with dances, novelties and beautiful musical numbers. Reserved seats at Brooks' Wednesday.

The Herald Square Opera Co. began its engagement at the Grand last night, singing the merry opera "Said Pasha" before a fashionable audience. There are some good voices in the company and the solo numbers were well received. Saxton's orchestra added much to the pleasure of the performance. The jolly and tuneful comic opera "Olivette" will be given to-night, which will close the engagement.
